THE penny was not always held in light esteem. It is a very old coin, originally silver. The fourth part of a penny was called by the Anglo-Saxons feorthunghence the present word, farthing.

Magazine Page

The National Daily

This Day in History

THIS is the anniversary of the death in 1859 of Thomas Babington Macaulay, historian, poet and writer. His "History of England," his "Lays of Ancient Rome," have won him a high place in literature.

THE ENEMIES OF WOMEN By BLASCO IBANEZ

An Engrossing Story of Life and Love, Thrilling Episodes and Unique Situations From the Master Pen of One of the World's Greatest Novelists.

HEN the Prince thought of Don Marcos, and what Atilio had told him. Poor Colonel! Imagine the man, at his age, trying to tame such a young wild

He walked with a springy step in the direction of Monte Carlo. He passed the villas and the gardens as though contact with the ground had given his step fresh vigor and as though the springlike air had abrogated to some extent the laws of gravity.

When he reached the city he stopped in front of the steps of San Carlos Church. Through the door he could see the twinkling tapers, smell the odor of flowers and hear the droning of the organ and the voices of female worshippers. He felt like a boy once more, buoyant and fresh as the morning and had an impulse to follow the various families in their Sunday best who were as-Catholic through his father, a member of the Greek church through his mother, and nothing by his own inclination. Suddenly he felt a certain repugnance for the cavelike darkness, laden with perfumes and dotted with lights. So he went on breathing the open air with delight.

But as the Prince approached Monte Carlo he met hundreds of soldiers of many nations: French. English, Sybian and a few Russian officers, who reminded him of the former importance that his country had had in the war. Every variety of uniform worn by the various armies of the Republic passed before his eyes, the horizon blue of the home troops, the mustard color of the soldiers of Morocco, the yellow fatigue caps of the French Legion and the red fez of the

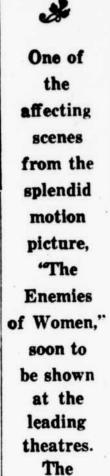

By Vincente Blasco Ibanez + Algerians and the negro sharp-

Each one was maimed. The sunny land, with its lovely views of sea and sky, seemed peopled with a race that had survived a cataclysm. Elegant looking officers, with handsome figures, limped along, cautiously dragging one leg or else ste ped gingerly on a foot so swathed in bandages that it was several times its nat ural size. Some of them were bent over like old men, leaning on sticks. Men of athletic pro portions trembled as they walked, as though their skeletons were rattling about in the hollow wrapper of their bodies, wasted by consumption. Fingers were missing on hands; arms had been cut off until the shapeless stumps looked like fins.

Under their pads of cotton, cheeks retained the gashes made by hand grenades, scars like those left by cancer; the horrible cavity of the nose, which had been torn away in some men, was hidden by a black tampon at tached to the ears. The faces of others were covered by masks of bandages, leaving nothing visible save eyes-sad eyes that seemed to look with fear to the day when tomed to the horror of a face that a few months before had been vouthful and now was like a vision in a nightmare.

The bodies of some of the passerby were intact, retaining their former strength and agility in all they had kept all the vigor and suppleness of youth. But they walked abreast, holding tightly to one another's arms, their eves lost in darkness, tapping the payement with a stick which had taken the place of the vanished

Michael stopped in the upper

Duchess de Delille (Alma Rubens) sees for the first time the son she has tried to forget (William Collier, Jr.) and experiences

a thrill of belated mother love and on the benches backing up to it one could observe the living soul of Monte Carlo. The devotees who lived in Monte Carlo were likewise flocking there and mingling with the people who had come from other places. The yall mounted the marble steps following the three stair carpets held in place by brass rods that glistened in the sun.

"And to think that we're at Michael thought. "And many of those who have gotten up early to make the trip and sons, or brothers, or husbands, who at the present moment are fighting and dying, perhaps."

Love of life, love of pleasure worked like an anaesthitic, causing them all to rise above their worries and forget so that they were able to live entirely in the present moment.

This general rush for the opening of the gaming hall disgusted the Prince and caused him to halt in his descent of the gentle slope of the gardens. It was repugnant to him to mix with the crowd that was loitering in the neigh-gave him an idea, "Suppose I go and surprise Alicia at her home. She had been at Villa-Sirena twice since her first visit. A friend, Clorinda, had servede as a pretext for another visit to the refuge in the beautiful gardens or the "Enemies of Women." He found the "Generaless" less hostile and dominating than hee had imagined; but he could not understand Castro's passion for her. In spite of her beauty it seemed to him that he was talking to a The duchess haed complained that day of Michael's looking you up: you never deign to visit my house. How poor I

Remembering her humble protest thee prince no longer hesi-Turning his back on the sloping streets in the direction of the frontier line separating Monte Carlo from Beausommeil, streets that displayed names recalling spring: The Street of thee Roses. of the Carnations, of the Violets. of the Orchids.

she was walking along with eher + Casino, he began to ascend the formed of a double row of garden fences. He caught a glimpse of the houses beetween columns of palm trees, and the firm leaves of the large magnolias. As he went along he read the names of the small estates carved on little plaques of red marble, placed at the entrances to the grounds, "Villa-Rosa;" here it was.

which was ajar, without hearing

WINTER

By BRICE BELDEN, M. D.

CIENTISTS are now telling

People feel better in the autumn, because of the favorable conditions of the autumn season. This improved feeling, say the scientists, is ascribed to the summer vacation which one has had, but it is really due to the fine balancing of temperature and humidity which prevails in the autumn. For the same reason we feel well in the spring.

In the winter low temperature and humidity lower our powers.

The theory that we do our best work in the winter is unsound.

We are at our best in the spring and autumn, in fair condition during the summer, but most in need of a vacation in winter, when our powers most need con

Summer is the best time for a vacation is so far as weather favorable to outdoor sports of the usual sort is concerned. Sum mer has its many charms, but this is really apart from the point under discussion.

that workers in factories are most likely to lay off because of factories shut down or put their workers on part time after Christmas. Workers who take their va cations during the winter, say around the beginning of the year, seem to do superior work the year around.

est efficiency, extremely cold weather is weakening, not ex-hilarating, despite the popular belief. Hot weather may be dis-

comforting, but it does not harm

More rest during the winter would reduce the nervousness of Americans, who work then at highest pressure.

Household Hints

Cold tea rubbed on varnished furniture will give it a brilliant us so much as cold weather.

the feeling of unfitness.

is during the cold months

us that we don't need a vacation in the summer so

Follow This Romance Here, Then Watch For It in Motion Pictures With Lionel Barrymore, Alma Rubens and an All-Star Cast

ing of a dog to greet his presence. He saw a small garden half deserted, grown up with weeds at the foot of the untrimmed trees and covering the space that had formerly been occupied by flower beds. The rest was emore care-e fully tended, but it was a vegetable garden, with rectangles of green stuffs, intensively cultivated.

Lubimoff approached without meeting anyone. It occurred to him that the gardener must have been the man with the dog. whom he had met as he turned into the street.

Then he mounted the four steps at the entrance. Here, too. the door was ajar, and pushing it all the way open, he found himself in a hallway with stairs leading to the upper story. There was no one in sight

He tried the doors of the adtoining rooms, and found them locked. There was not a sound as though the house were deserted. But the silence was suddenly broken by a voice floating down the stairway. It was a faint voice, singing a slow, sad English air. The song was accompanied by a sound of dull blows, as though hands were beating and shaping up some large unresisting object.

Michael thought he recognized Alicia's voice. He coughed several times without result: he was not heard. He was about to call to let her know he was there. but refrained, through a sudden her. Why shouldn't he surprise her by going upstairs, the one part of the house where she was now living? His hesitation vanished. Upstairs he would go!

From the first landing he saw several doors, but only one was open, and it was from that one that the sounds of the song and the thumping were coming. A the sound of a voice or the bark- + woman bending over a bed, was holding out her arms and vigorously shaking up a pillow. Instinctively she felt that some one was standing behind her, and turning around she gave an exclamation of surprise on seeing Michael in the doorway. He, for his part, was no less surprised to recognize the woman as Alicia; an Alicia dressed in an elegant but old negligee, with crumpled gloves on her hands, and a veil wrapped around her hair.

> "You! It's you!" she exclaimed "How you frightened me!"

Immediately she recovered her composure, and smiled at Michael when he tried to explain his intrusion. He had not met any one; the gate and door were open. She too excused herself, in turn. It was Sunday: Valeria. her companion, had gone to Nice to take lunch with a family she knew; her maid and the gardener's wife were at mass; the old man had gone out a moment ago to see some friends.

After these mutual explanations they both remained silent. looking at each other hesitatingly, not knowing what to say, but still smiling.

"You making your bed?" Michael remarked just to say something.

A Decided Novelty. "So you see. . This is rather different from my bedroom in Paris. It is hardly the 'study' that I took you to, either. Times have changed.'

Michael gravely nodded assent Yes, times have changed.

"At any rate," Alicia laughed, 'you must confess that there is a certain novelty in seeing the Duchess de Delille, madcap Alicia, making her bed." Copyright, 1918, by E. P. Dutton & Co. All Rights Reserved.

(To Be Continued Monday.)

YOUR RICH FRIENDS

By Beatrice Fairfax. + can afford and what another can-Who Occupies a Unique Position in the Writing World as an Authority on the Prob-

VICE belongs to a group of A girls all of whom have more worldly goods than she. One of her chums has great wealth, another has beauty as well as position, another has family to add to the riches her father dowers her with, and the fourth has just made a brilliant marriage.

Avice has a splendid position. She earns twenty-six hundred dollars a year and has no one dependent on her for support. But the fifty dollars a week which might mean so much to another girl is little indeed measured in terms of the country houses and automobiles and smart apartments of Avice's friends. Someone said to me the other day: keeps up with the crowd she goes with. She must be a regular little parasite—taking everything and giving nothing. I'll bet all her pretty clothes come from of her friend's cast off garment bags. I'll wager she grafts about every dinner and never pays a taxi fare when she can get one of her pals to send a car for I tell you that girl is a grafter for fair and I know it."

"A grafter." I repeated. "Isn't there any way of keeping up your end of things except in terms of dinners and auto rides and weekends at country homes? Now I happen to know that Avice May gives her friends things far more important than the worldly benefits they can heap upon her without any cost to themselves. She gives sympathy, understand-ing, loyalty, help in the problems we all have to face, her time, ant serenely, "I daresay. But she is a grafter all the same and every one thinks so. That's what around with a millionaire bunch on a fifty-a-week salary. Nor could she be moved from her position. She went right on insisting that everybody knows that when a poor girl travels with a rich set she has to keep up, and the only way to do it is to be a little sister of the rich and take the crumbs that fall

If any one of you have tried going about with folks who have a lot more money than you have you know the struggle there is to do the things they do, to pay your way in some coin of the realm and to keep up appear-ances, so you won't stand out as Yet why should friendships be measured in terms of what one not? Chiefly because we all grow accustomed to living on the scale we can afford. And when we glimpse things beyond our means we admire them and pass by. But when we are brought in constant contact with the rich and the luxurious we do not glance and wave them aside as out of our reach. We are likely to begin contriving and planning to own what seems taken for granted by every one else we know.

Most of us are happier paying our way in the accepted coin of exchange. Most of us feel at home traveling with folks to whom the movies-or a seat in the gallery at the opera—is a treat, if those things are suited to our means. And we feel ill at case in parterre boxes when our whole year's inscription seat at the opera.

Work and ability enable us all to climb the social ladder-to climb out of an environment we do not find satisfying. But the thing we have presented to us by favor of our rich friends affects us a bit as it did Avice's critic. We feel like grafters—and that is the next step to being parasites and syco-

We must all be careful to pay our way as we go, and not to strive to make ourselves a place in any group where we cannot give fully

RECIPES YOU WILL LIKE

These recipes have been tested by Good Housekeeping Institute and are republished by special arrangement with Good Housekeeping, the nation's greatest magazine of the home.

Tea Dainties.

ANOTHER especially good tea accompaniment is Tea Dainties, because they are not oversweet. Sift together two cupfuls of pastry flour, two tablespoonfuls of sugar, one teaspoonful of salt, and four teaspoonfuls of baking powder. Cut into these dry ingredients four tablespoonfuls of shortening until well blended. Add gradually three-fourths cupful of milk, thus forming a soft dough.

Place a teaspoonful of this mixture in small, greased gem pans. Then add to each one-half teaspoonful of marshmallow paste, one-half a stoned date, and a few chopped walnut meats. Cover another teaspoonful of the dough and bake in a 400-degree F. oven for ten or twelve minutes. This recipe makes about twenty

FASHIONABLE FOOTWEAR

-By Rita Stuyvesant-

HE longer frocks have brought about an interest ing change in shoes. The heels of the past season are no longer in vogue for day-time wear, except for sports. There is nothing so ungainly as a longdraped gown, worn with flat heels, for this type of gown requires the French or baby French heels for afternoon or evening and the moderately high Cuban heel with tailored frocks. No longer is it correct to wear the sandal type of shoe for day time, for one now finds the tongue or buckle shoe in first The large colonial tongue is shown in leather matching the pump, or is made of black velvet shirred to a fan shape. Gray in all shades, browns and black are seen during the day and buckles are of cut steel or jet. With these pumps one wears the sheerest of chiffon hose, and the fashionable woman chooses the deep taupe shade of hosiery, rather than black, because it appears even more transparent.

For walking or driving or skating the low heel is in evidence and cordovan pumps with a single strap are accompanied by spats to insure warmth. Woollen hose, too. is again in evidence for strenuous weather. Sandals are still being worn teresting features. Metal brocade has invaded even the winter footwear, and the success of the evening costume may be due in part at least to the attractive footwear. Heels of plain colors are effective on the brocaded slippers.

A pair of silver or gold slippers for evening is really an economy, for they may be worn with all kinds of gowns regardless of the color, and clean won derfully well when tarnished.

The baby doll pumps with the broad strap across the ankle, tied at the outside by a ribbon bow are well liked for afternoon wear and may be selected in satin or patent leather. The toe is quaintly rounded after the French fash ion of the anst season.

For the woman who admires the charm of the long narrow vamp, pointed sharply at the toe, there are many excellent models Single and double straps are as well as tongue and

Know That—

Young oysters float on the sur-face of the water for a time, then sink and fasten themselves to the bottom. Thus attached, they extract lime from the water and deposit it as a shell about

The largest specie is probably the sulphur-bottomed or blue whale, which reaches a length of ninety feet or more, and approaches seventy tops in weight.

THE STRANGER

By John Goodman. 1ND the shop!" he bawled to his uncle as he rushed down the passage.

"I'm off!" "Off!" exclaimed Mr. Taggart, catching hold of him, "where to?" "Dunno. But o' the way. I'm called for."

Te flung his astonished trainer violently against the wall and scudded along Billiter street, his overcoat flapping in the wind and his cap over one eye.
"Maybe that bloke I dotted is after her again," he muttered, "a An hour of rapid transit brought him to Lambeth, and he arrived, breathless and panting, in the little third-story sitting room. Joan

She was standing erect, deadly pale, her lips curved in a faint fixed smile that reminded Alf of a waxwork figure. He stopped short and stared at her, smitten with a sudden sense of tragedy for which he could not account. His gaze traveled over the cheap linen dress and the worn shoes. The look of strained suffering in her eyes made

"What's gone amiss?" he said "Jack brought your hoarsely. note. You-you've need of me,

"The question," said Joan quietly, "is whether you have need of

He gaped at her quite at a loss. Joan looked at him strangely. Twice her lips moved as if in an effort to speak, but she said nothing "You got something you want me to do?" he said eagerly. "Anything on earth—just say it an' it's done, Joan-m-lady!" "Don't call me that," she said quickly. "Have you not heard? Hasn't Emmie told you?" "She's told me nothin'. I ain't "Ah, I see." said Joan, very slowly. The color flamed once to her cheeks and 'faded again. "I thought-perhaps she told you.

No doubt she thinks-now her voice nearly failed her. "She's quite right -Joan swayed a little and caught at the chair beside her. "You ain't well!" exclaimed Alf, starting forward in alarm. "down. Shall I fetch somebody?"

"No, no! Don't bring anybody!" Joan sank into the chair. "Sit over there, will you, Alf—by the window?" He seated himself, looking rather frightened, where the light was full on his face. "There has been a—a blunder," said Joan,
"I am not Lady Tallbols. I—I'm turned out. I have no money—no name—no anything. That is all."

She told him the pith of the story in a strangely even, emotionless voice. It seemed to Alf as though he were listening to someone talking in their sleep. Yet she made it pitilessly clear. There was conviction in every

The thing came home to Alf like a thunderclap. For a few moments his mind seemed to grope blindly after the truth. Into his eyes came a light of joy and amasement that

+ he could not suppress-a light of hope. He sprang up.

> CHAPTER LIV. "Joan's Bargain."

"Then-you ain't a viscountess:" he gasped. "You-you're just-Joan! She nodded.

"Joan" he repeated dazedly, and then with a look of interrogation. 'Joan-Ayre?' "No," she said, "not that. Joan Nothing. Joan Nobody." She gave a dreadful little laugh. "Joan-without a name," she said very quietly, "the unclaimed child of a thief. Now do you under-Certainly, he understood stared at her blankly and tried to "What of it!" he said with a sudden wild outburst. "What's all this talk of what you are? You're Joan. What have them cursed toffs done to you?" "Nothing. I have come back to my friend. Emmie has given me shelter.' "But," he said in a strangled voice, "that chap you was goin Alf checked himself in time. He had not realized what he was saying.

"If they've treated you bad," he said, shaking with rage, "all that kid-glove crowd—let me pay 'em! There must be rights of yours, that you can have yet. Tell me more about it—give me the job. Joan, it'll suit me!"

"No," she said quickly, "you are wrong. And all that is ended— finished. Don't speak of it again. That's not what I called you here for, Alf."
"What then?" he said, bewildered.

did not look at him, but stared dully at the wall, and for some "Can you not guess?" she mut-tered, "or—must I tell you?" There was a stifled noise in Alf's throat. He leaned forward

Joan was white as a sheet. She trembling. "Joan. D'you mean—there's a chance for me!" he said hoarsely. "Do you want me-still?" said quietly.

"Want you!" he gasped, rising and moving slowly toward her, "to me, you're just the queen of all the women as walk on earth—an' always will be. Lord above us, do you think I care what you've got or ain't got? You're you! I love you. Want you!" She held up her hand.

"Stop," she said, "I have a warning to give you. It will be best for you to go now, and leave the word unsaid. Best, a hundred times, for you. To—to turn me down. You are worth a much better fate than I can give. But it must be for you to choose. (Copyright, 1922, by King Features Syndicate, Inc.) (To Be Continued Monday.)

He entered a short avenue

He pushed open the iron gate.

VACATIONS IN WHEN A GIRL MARRIES

I sad. at luncheon."

I asked.

Realizing that they had to work off some of their energy in this

Lacy. "We got out to Hoadley's still talking about the South American deal in hats, which I heard about through some national advertisers who are in touch with the South American market. Hoadley was eating it up because it was hats. Young Rockhill was eating it up because it looked like money for the Yelda bunch, and they needed the cash. And then Park quietly asked ed to have handle the deal."

which concern Mr. Hoadley want-"And that clarified things in "You said it!" approved Lacy. "Hoadley stormed out that his hat company was the apple of his eye, and he didn't see why of his eye, and he didn't see why big deal like this should be handled in any other way than through Hoadley's Hats. Then

Park got into the game again—say, Park, you tell her what you you'd coached me to say. I burst out as one inspired and remarked that since the tip which was turning out to be such a good hill, I thought it belonged to him

lead had come from me to Rock-and to his company through which I'd elected to do the job

Whereupon Mr. Hoadley, with some of the engaging stubborn-nes of an old mule, said that if I thought I could handle this with out him, why didn't I say so. And I smiled and said I wouldn't go as far as to say that. This remark—I pause to add—was also rehearsed and drilled into me by that Master Mind, R. Lacy, who will now continue with his Ma-

"Language flew all about," Mr Lacy smiled reminiscently. "And all of a sudden. Max Hoadley got an inspiration. He had been talking with a great deal of vividness and candor. But suddenly he sat back and began to size up the situation and Park. Then he be-cumspectly, as one who fears that his tread may be too heavy

"Finally, with a great deal of ponderous finesse, Hoadley came to the point toward which we'd been goading him," said Mr. Lacy, obediently taking up his account again. "And he explained that he'd been contemplating selling out his hat business in order to take a more active interest in the important concern. But his hats.

he confessed, were the apple of his eye. And the Yelda company had grown so that it was no longer a one-man concern. Now he'd like to see a fine, bright young man like Mr. Parkinson interesting himself in a business

Lacy. "Park was completely nonchalant, taking out a cigarette and tapping it on his case in the best approved fashion. I asked why a man who was all enthusiasm about an idea didn't try to sell us. And Mr. Hoadley con-fessed, sadly by firmly, that he

"All this while," continued Mr.

of that sort.

and his touch not light enoug gan to aproach him-very chievellian revelations.

"Sure, I'll tell her! I said what

T HE by-play between Wayne Parkinson and me was mercifully lost on Ralph But Park made me feel that in crying out my faith in his friend I had revealed something he was either very glad or very sorry to know. I wasn't sure

"Please go on with your story," said. "I want to know what occurred when you two and the Hoadley-Rockhill combination met except an appointment to meet at dinner. It was from that dinner I telephoned you to beg for an hour. Max Hoadley was going out to his country place. Being a gentleman of fixed and settled habits, he seemed to think he must start at his regular hour." "What did you want of me?"

"We wanted you to introduce some simple truth into what threatened to be nothing but a maze of diplomacy and of back ing and filling to little or no purpose. It may have been our good fortune that you could not come "That's not very gallant, is it?"

"You want the truth," replied Mr. Lacy, intently, "If you'd come we would have yielded to the temptation to force the issue. As it is things were carried over. They kept being 'continued in our next.' And last night we came down to Hoadley's country place for a conference. We telephoned you from there. When Park seemed to be chanting meaningless songs just now he was indicating the unexpected element that enters into all our lives. That 'where did you come from. haby dear-or; of the nowhere into the here referred to the amazing fact that we had come from a week-end with Max Hoad-along. Park said that of course he was Miss May's client." "After which"-broke in Park with one of his chuckles-"the contact all but got itself edrawn up without regard for Sunday. But Park and I would have none

(To Be Continued Tuesday.)

To remove ink stains while fresh, sprinkle with salt and rub with a cut lemon. Rinse out the lemon juice and wash at once. If hot stewed fruit is to be served in a glass dish, place the not crack when the fruit is poured

After use, a sponge should be squeezed as dry as possible and then hung up by a string in the air to dry. When used with soap it should be squeezed in warm water and left to lie for a few minutes in cold water. Soap should never be left in sponges, and they should not be wrung. as this breaks the fibres and in jures the elasticity.

By Ann Lisle

"Nothing," Ralph Lacy grinned eyishly. "That is, nothing much

I laughed, quickly adding: 'Not that I mind it in the least."

''Go on-you big bully," laugh-fashion, I sat tolerantly still, like the big sister to two roguish "It's like this," continued Raiph the Hoadley mind." I exclaimed was more or less under obliga tions to a Miss May, who had been trying to get him to sell out Hoadley's Hats to a client of hers. And he couldn't in honesty and decency make a decisive move in the game until he'd seen her "And then, what?" I demanded.

"And then, with continued nonchalance, don't you know, and with the idle air of bein aston-ished that it wasn't clear all of all that haste. He had to see you and to have a conference with Miss May."